

Jenni Quilter

1993-1997

Jenni Quilter currently lives in New York and is the Director of Global Awards and Clinical Assistant Professor in the Expository Writing Program at NYU. She also writes, usually about collaborations between artists and writers in New York, cultural anthropology and is currently writing a book about assisted reproductive technologies, specifically in-vitro fertilisation.

Jenni has taught at Oxford University, where she also obtained her Masters of Philosophy and Doctorate of Philosophy in English Literature as a Rhodes Scholar, from New Zealand.

At high school, Jenni knew she wanted to be a writer, she was very clear about that. Her teachers were really encouraging and motivated her to pursue it as a career. Her advice for current EGGS students is to not be content to think that the only opportunities are the ones explicitly presented to you, you yourself have to go out and investigate them.

“Don’t be content to think that the only opportunities are the ones explicitly presented to you.”
